Involvement in medical research may include drug trials, collection of personal information for external surveys or trialling new procedures or treatments.

It is the policy of the company that no invasive medical research be carried out by the company. However, in line with good practice the company may undertake collection of data for quality improvement or undertake non-invasive research including trialling of new equipment.

Should a client be involved in a trial then the trainer should ensure they understand any requirements specific to their training. This may included contacting the research body prior to training being undertaken.
